2. [In aſtronomy.]

Libration is the balancing motion or trepidation in the firmament, whereby the declination of the ſun, and the latitude of the ſtars change from time to time. Aſtronomers likewiſe aſcribe to the moon a libratory motion, or motion of trepidation, which they pretend is from eaſt to weſt, and from north to ſouth, becauſe that, at full moon, they ſometimes diſcover parts of her diſk which are not diſcovered at other times. Theſe kinds are called, the one a libration in longitude, and the other a libration in latitude. Beſides this, there is a third kind, which they call an apparent libration, and which conſiſts in this, that when the moon is at her greateſt elongation from the ſouth, her axis being then almoſt perpendicular to the plane of the ecliptick, the ſun muſt enlighten towards the north pole of the moon ſome parts which he did not before, and that on the contrary, ſome parts of thoſe which he enlightened towards the oppoſite pole are obſcured; and this produces the ſame effect which the libration in latitude does. *Dict. Logarithms, which are the indexes of the ratios of numbers one to another, were firſt invented by Napier, lord Merchiſon, a Scottiſh baron, and afterwards completed by Mr. Briggs, Savilian profeſſor at Oxford. They are a ſeries of artificial numbers, contrived for the expedition of calculation, and proceeding in an arithmetical proportion, as the numbers they anſwer to do in a geometrical one; for inſtance,

0	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
1	2	4	8	16	32	64	128	256	512

Where the numbers above, beginning with (0), and arithmetically proportional, are called logarithms. The addition and ſubtraction of logarithms anſwers to the multiplication and diviſion of the numbers they correſpond with; and this ſaves an infinite deal of trouble. In like manner will the extractions of roots be performed, by diſſecting the logarithms of any numbers for the ſquare root, and triſecting them for the cube, and ſo on. Harris.

MA'NOR. n. ſ. [manoir, old French; manerium, low Latin; maner, Armorick.]

Manor ſignifies, in common law, a rule or government which a man hath over ſuch as hold land within his fee. Touching the original of theſe manors, it ſeems, that, in the beginning, there was a certain compaſs of ground granted by the king to ſome man of worth, for him and his heirs to dwell upon, and to exerciſe ſome juriſdiction, more or leſs, within that compaſs, as he thought good to grant; performing him ſuch ſervices, and paying ſuch yearly rent for the ſame, as he by his grant required: and that afterward this great man parcelled his land to other meaner men, injoining them again ſuch ſervices and rents as he thought good; and by that means, as he became tenant to the king, ſo the inferiors became tenants to him: but thoſe great men, or their poſterity, have alienated theſe manſions and lands ſo given them by their prince, and many for capital offences have forfeited them to the king; and thereby they ſtill remain in the crown, or are beſtowed again upon others. But whoſoever poſſeſſes theſe manors, the liberty belonging to them is real and predial, and therefore remains, though the owners be changed. In theſe days, a manor rather ſignifies the juriſdiction and royalty incorporeal, than the land or ſite: for a man may have a manor in groſs, as the law terms it, that is, the right and intereſt of a court-baron, with the perquiſites thereto belonging. Cowel.

MA'RCASITE. n. ſ.

The term marcaſite has been very improperly uſed by ſome for biſmuth, and by others for zink: the more accurate writers however always expreſs a ſubſtance different from either of theſe by it, ſulphureous and metallick. The marcaſite is a ſolid hard foſſil, naturally found among the veins of ores, or in the fiſſures of ſtone: the variety of forms this mineral puts on is almoſt endleſs. There are however only three diſtinct ſpecies of it; one of a bright gold colour, another of a bright ſilver, and a third of a dead white: the ſilvery one ſeems to be peculiarly meant by the writers on the Materia Medica. Marcaſite is very frequent in the mines of Cornwall, where the workmen call it mundick, but more in Germany, where they extract vitriol and ſulphur from it. Hill.

The writers of minerals give the name pyrites and marcaſites indifferently to the ſame ſort of body: I reſtrain the name of pyrites wholly to the nodules, or thoſe that are found lodged in ſtrata that are ſeparate: the marcaſite is part of the matter that either conſtitutes the ſtratum, or is lodged in the perpendicular fiſſures. Woodw. Met. Foſ.

The acid ſalt diſſolved in water is the ſame with oil of ſulphur per campanam, and abounding much in the bowels of the earth, and particularly in martaſites, unites itſelf to the other ingredients of the marcaſite, which are bitumen, iron, copper, and earth, and with them compounds alum, vitriol, and ſulphur: with the earth alone it compounds alum; with the metal alone, and metal and earth together, it compounds vitriol; and with the bitumen and earth it compounds ſulphur: whence it comes to paſs, that marcaſites abound with thoſe three minerals. Newton's Opticks.

Here marcaſites in various figures wait,
To ripen to a true metallick ſtate. Garth's Diſp.

Mildew is a diſeaſe in plants, cauſed by a dewy moiſture which falls on them, and continuing, for want of the ſun's heat, to draw it up, by its acrimony corrodes, gnaws, and ſpoils the plant: or, mildew is rather a concrete ſubſtance, which exſudes through the pores of the leaves. What the gardeners commonly call mildew is an inſect, found in great plenty, preying upon this exſudation. Others ſay, that mildew is a thick, clammy vapour, exhaled in the Spring and Summer from the plants, bloſſoms, and even the earth itſelf, in cloſe, ſtill weather, where there is neither ſun nor wind. Miller thinks the true cauſe of the mildew appearing moſt upon plants which are expoſed to the Eaſt, is a dry temperature in the air when the wind blows from that point, which ſtops the pores of the plants, and prevents their perſpiration; whereby the juices of the plants are concreted upon the ſurface of their leaves, which being of a ſweetiſh nature, inſects are inticed thereto. Hill.

The manner of its propagation is as follows: the miſſletoe thruſh, which feeds upon the berries of this plant in winter when it is ripe, doth open the ſeed from tree to tree; for the viſcous part of the body, which immediately ſurrounds the ſeed, doth ſometimes faſten it to the outward part of the bird's beak, which, to get diſengaged of, he ſtrikes his beak at the branches of a neighbouring tree, and ſo leaves the ſeed ſticking by this viſcous matter to the bark, which, if it lights upon a ſmooth part of the tree, will faſten itſelf, and the following winter put out and grow; the trees which this plant doth moſt readily take upon are the apple, the aſh, and ſome other ſmooth rind trees: whenever a branch of an oak tree hath any of theſe plants growing upon it, it is cut off, and preſerved by the curious in their collections of natural curioſities. Miller.

1. A dead body preserved by the Egyptian art of embalming.

We have two substances for medicinal use under the name of mummy: one is the dried flesh of human bodies embalmed with myrrh and spice; the other is the liquor running from such mummies when newly prepared, or when affected by great heat, or by damps: this is sometimes of a liquid, sometimes of a solid form, as it is preserved in vials, or suffered to dry: the first kind is brought in large pieces, of a friable texture, light and spungy, of a blackish brown colour, and often black and clammy on the surface; it is of a strong but not agreeable smell: the second, in its liquid state, is a thick, opake, and viscous fluid, of a blackish and a strong, but not disagreeable smell: in its indurate state it is a dry, solid substance, of a fine shining black colour and texture, easily broken, and of a good smell: this sort is extremely dear, and the first sort so cheap, that we are not to imagine it to be the ancient Egyptian mummy. What our druggists are supplied with is the flesh of any bodies the Jews can get, who fill them with the common bitumen so plentiful in that part of the world, and adding aloes, and some other cheap ingredients, send them to be baked in an oven till the juices are exhaled, and the embalming matter has penetrated. Hill's Materia Medica.

NI'TRE. n. ſ. [nitre, Fr. nitrum, Latin.]

The ſalt which we know at this time, under the name of nitre, or ſalt petre, is a cryſtalline pellucid, but ſomewhat whitiſh ſubſtance, of an acrid and bitteriſh taſte, impreſſing a peculiar ſenſe of coldneſs upon the tongue. This ſalt, though it affords, by means of fire, an acid ſpirit capable of diſſolving almoſt every thing, yet manifeſts no ſign of its containing any acid at all in its crude ſtate. Nitre is of the number of thoſe ſalts which are naturally blended in imperceptible particles in earths, ſtones, and other foſſil ſubſtances, as the particles of metals are in their ores: it is ſometimes however found pure, in form of an efflorescence, either on its ores or on the ſurface of old walls; theſe efflorescences diſſolved in proper water, ſhooting into regular and proper cryſtals of nitre. The earth from which nitre is made, both in Perſia and the Eaſt-Indies, is a kind of yelloviſh marl found in the bare cliffs of the ſides of hills expoſed to the northern and eaſtern winds, and never in any other ſituation. The natrum or nitre of the ancients, is a genuine, native, and pure ſalt, extremely different from our nitre, and from all other native ſalts; being a fixed alkali plainly of the nature of thoſe made by fire from vegetables, yet being capable of a regular cryſtallization, which thoſe ſalts are not. It is found on or very near the ſurface of the earth, in thin flat cakes, ſpungy, light, and friable; and when pure, of a pale browniſh white colour. In ſcripture we find that the ſalt called nitre would ferment with vinegar, and had an abſterſive quality, properties which perfectly agree with this ſalt, but not with ſalt-petre, as do many difficult qualities aſcribed to it by the ancients. Hill on Foſſil.

Some tumultuous cloud,
Inſtinct with fire and nitre, hurried him. Milton.
